

Robin Buning

During my research stay at Oxford I made an inventory of the 647 items from the correspondence of Isaac Vossius in the Bodleian Library. This research was part of a larger project involving research in the University Libraries of Leiden and Amsterdam, which keep the two largest collections of Vossius' letters. These collections have autographs and manuscript copies, so there was bound to be overlap, but no one had ever compared the collections. The project aimed at bringing together in a single database all the metadata over the disparate complete correspondence of Vossius, identifying all the individual letters and listing per letter the shelf marks of autographs and apographs, and adding references to published versions. I have entered the basic metadata (date, sender, recipient, their locations, manifestations, incipit, language and related resources) of each individual letter into Oxford's open access union catalogue of learned correspondence, Early Modern Letters Online (<http://emlo.bodleian.ox.ac.uk>). Although the Bodleian card catalogue, including 614 items from Vossius' correspondence, had already been digitized and ingested into EMLO, these records could not be used to compare the three collections since the Bodleian catalogue cards and consequently the records in EMLO all lack incipits and one fourth of the letters are not dated. By far the largest part of the collection in the Bodleian Library, containing 558 letters, proved to be copies of autographs in the Amsterdam University Library. A large part of the collection in the Leiden University Library consists of copies from these same autographs. This means that there is indeed a large overlap between the Oxford collection and the Amsterdam and Leiden collections. I further made use of the extensive collection of library catalogues in the Bodleian Library to track down items from Vossius' correspondence in other repositories. This resulted in the discovery of another 150-175 letters. My inventory of Vossius' correspondence now consists of an estimated total of 1800 letters, transmitted in autograph and/or (more than one) manuscript copy and/or printed version. They will be published with a short introduction in EMLO towards the end of 2015. During my stay in Oxford I also provided hands-on assistance during the COST-funded conference, Working Group meetings and training school there on 22-25 March.